To evaluate the effect of radiofrequency energy delivery on the friction between the intraocular lens optic and haptic. Department of Ophthalmology, Kinki University School of Medicine, Osaka, Japan. Forty-two silicone lenses of 3 different materials and 6 polypropylene haptics of 3 different materials were implanted into 10 New Zealand white rabbits using a standardized surgical technique. After 1 or 2 weeks, the intraocular pressure (IOP) was measured using a hand-held applanation tonometer. The haptics were then extracted from the anterior chamber and the friction between the lens optic and the haptic was measured with a friction tester. The
