With the continued emphasis on reducing the hazards associated with various fire-related products, there has been a renewed interest in finding better ways to protect people and property from fire and heat-related damage. One way of providing heat resistance is by coating the object to be protected. The early efforts at flame retardancy involved the use of materials which melt or soften at high temperatures, thus releasing the gases which give rise to a flame. Some examples of these are molten metals, molten glass, molten plastics, charring materials, and some type of preformed foam. These materials are useful in some instances but their use is not without problems. For example, the high temperature released during melting can cause damage to the object being protected, if melting occurs in the normal course of the object's intended use. In the case of foams, their use is limited to situations where they release their protective gas to aid the combustion process. With the increased emphasis on providing fire-resistance in manufactured goods, an increasing number of materials are being used in the manufacture of these goods. One class of materials which has proven particularly useful is a class of materials known as flame-retardant resin systems. These materials are typically applied as films, coatings, and liners. A typical flame-retardant resin system is based on a brominated or chlorinated hydrocarbon or aromatic. While useful, such systems do have certain disadvantages. They can be flammable themselves, they can become contaminated by contaminants in the object being protected, and they can attack certain types of substrates, thus shortening their useful life. It has been a recent discovery that melamine/formaldehyde resins can be used to prepare flame-retardant
