CS4 brought the biggest change in the history of Photoshop—a shift from illustrating to defining. Illustrating in Photoshop is very different from defining. In defining, you apply layer masks, brushes, and shapes to an image. You often work on layers, so you can see the effects of a selection, a fill or an adjustment in one image at a time. Few people understand the power and versatility of layers. Discovering them is like learning a foreign language. Being selective about the kinds of changes on a layer offers you more precision. Colors change, contrast is increased, or elements are blurred, compressed, expanded or moved. These small changes on a layer are not done in one shot—they are incremental. You can see the effect of each stroke on a plain white layer in real time. Layers allow you to drag editors back through your Photoshop files. When you notice you need to do a complicated task to save time, you drag into the Layers panel. That way, you can undo undo. Once again, it is a very efficient way to gain speed by massaging a set of actions. It makes little sense to change our image in the dark or repeatedly undo and redo the same change over and over. If a particular setting on a layer is harmful, later, you can just hide it. Most people have used Photoshop since the very beginning. Some attributes may not be familiar to everyone, especially with a major change like the morph between Illustrate and Define. With CS4, though, the transition to a new way of illustrating is natural. It also includes a new default workflow. Photoshop works more like a drawing program than a photo editor. When you need to change an image to place a logo, a watermark or a new element a drawing would be a good starting point. Imagine, for example, that you need a new logo on your image. In Adobe Photoshop, you go to File, New, Embedded or Type. Then, you open a logo file, adjust its size, and click Place One.

Louisiana Hall The Louisiana Hall was a historic commercial building located at 609 North Center Street in La Grange, Illinois. Built in 1874, the Louisiana Hall was La Grange's first brick building and the only commercial building constructed in the community until 1883. It was also the city's largest building in terms of floor space. It was designed by Chicago architect Robert H. Wentworth, and was built by George B. Newman. The brick building, which measured by and was topped by a mansard roof, had an integral office on the first floor and a retailing space on the second. The building's iron frame was clad in brick, and the entrance was a recessed porch located on the front façade. It featured an unusual white scrolled frieze and a cupola at the roof line. The building was part of the Historic La Grange Register and the city of La Grange's "Supercenter" district, which had been designated a landmark. Ownership of the Louisiana Hall was acquired by Joseph H. Bogart in 1917. Bogart was a life-long La Grange resident that retired from the lumber industry. He redeveloped the building in 1917, when he had the building divided into two storefronts and rented it to implement his vision of Chicago architecture. Shortly after being developed, the retail building was renamed to the Louisiana Building. It survived with little alteration for over 40 years before it was demolished in 1957. The building was added to the National Register of Historic Places on November 10, 1990.
