I've been heavily involved with computer graphics and image editing since the early 1980s, and I've seen a lot of software come and go. I've tested every major application on the market, and the best are still unique, quirky, and amazingly customizable. I love seeing desktop applications come back, like Photoshop, with updated code that updates the workflow of the industry, and I'm happy when the new features and usability of my tools feel new and fresh, even though I've worked with them for years. I also love when developers retell a story with a new narrative, much like how Pixar created a whole new medium with Toy Story. Some of my favorite software timepieces are older applications refactored over the years - usually the more obscure the application, the better the upgrade. As you can imagine, I've amassed quite a collection of digital assets, ranging from snapshots to illustrations, branding packages, logos, and retouching projects. My day is spent organizing, cataloging, and creating useful web albums, and my drive to help others in this process has created a large body of work that defines my personal aesthetic. The software that I use most often is Adobe Photoshop. I purchased the CS2 package with the 25-50% discount when it was discounted, and as I originally entered the creative atmosphere for graphic design, my first love (in the 1980s) was most certainly Adobe Photoshop. Oh, the days I lost track of time on the classic "cleaning-up" projects, I swear! It was before Photoshop Elements, before Photoshop was on the web, and before Photoshop CC came out, with no workflow extensions. I was fairly new to the work then, but I used all the tools—especially Adobe Fireworks (more on that later)—to create, refine, refine, and refine, until it was done. (After all, you can't fix it if you don't see it.)
